

Re: the proposed change to Indiana's Do-Not-Call law - or telephone privacy law. Before I signed up for the do-not-call list I was constantly bombarded, particularly at dinner in the early evening, by telephone solicitors of various types. Most persistent were the members of the banking community, as well as credit card promoters. These folks are intrusive, obnoxious and very tiresome. It does not matter to me if I have EVER done business with them in the past. If I am interested in a product or a service I will be the one to call the provider. For them to call me is a sure way to permanently lose a customer. These businesses already have far more latitude than any business has a right to expect. Intrusion based on a premise of a 'business relationship' is tenuous at the very best. Please do not grant this industry - or any other the ability to weaken what is a very effective law. It has produced a quite welcome cessation of a very serious and extremely bothersome problem.

Thanks.
